Social Determinism and Constructal Theory To illustrate the connection between constructal theory and social determinism, consider the example of the access to elite superior education in France. In France, the system of superior education is divided into two kinds of structures. These flows have objectives (e.g., minimization of effort, travel time, cost), and the objectives clash with global constraints (space, time, resources). It brings social organization under the same physics principle that accounts for the generation of flow architecture (design) in geophysical flows, animal design, and engineered flows.
